Do You Have This in Common With Brad Pitt? The Scoop on Parental Alienation

Whether you follow celebrity gossip religiously or just like to scan the tabloids when you pass a newsstand, you've probably heard about the latest conflict between famous divorcees Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie. A recent TMZ headline blared, "Brad Pitt Sources Say Angelina Has Poisoned Kids Against Him... She's On a Hate Campaign."

These articles are chock-full of drama, but they also contain some legalese — specifically the phrase "parental alienation," which journalists have applied to celebrities like Brad Pitt and Alec Baldwin and may even apply to you. If you're divorced, have children, and aren't on good terms with your partner, you should be on high alert for signs of parental alienation.

What is parental alienation?

According to a resource published by the American Bar Association (ABA), parental alienation is a "mental condition in which a child — usually one whose parents are engaged in a high-conflict separation or divorce — allies him or herself strongly with an alienating parent and rejects a relationship with the 'target' parent without legitimate justification."

In other words, a child can fall victim to parental alienation if one of their parents constantly paints the other in a bad light through comparisons, exaggeration, lies, and manipulation. This can be emotional, verbal, or even financial.

Everyone Needs an Estate Planning Notebook! Save Your Family From Experiencing Additional Heartache

I have enjoyed helping clients create estate plans for over 35 years now, but it didn't take me long to discover that having a good Will or Trust wasn't enough to prevent family chaos and infighting. So, I began to develop an Estate Planning Notebook system to explain, memorialize, and organize information that Wills and Trusts don't cover.

Each section of the notebook offers an easy solution to the worst problems I've witnessed as an Elder Law attorney. The intention of this notebook is to help you and your loved ones quickly and peacefully settle your affairs. Here are some of the more eye-opening sections of the Estate Planning Notebook.

Document Location

Nebraska law requires that your original Will be filed with the court before it can be probated, so let your heirs know where your essential estate planning documents are located. You can describe that information in your notebook.

Personal Property List

If you don't want your heirs to argue over who gets what, describe which assets will go where in the handy notebook form.

Life Insurance

Finding life insurance policies is almost always the most time-consuming and frustrating task for your family. Do them a favor by putting a copy of the "Declaration" page, which contains all the information about your policy, in the notebook so your policy can be found and processed after your death.

Virtual Contact Information

You'll need to jot down your logins and passwords for your various internet accounts for family access later. List your computer, phone, social media sites, streaming services, online brokerage accounts, insurance accounts, bank accounts, credit cards, or retirement accounts.

You don't want your heirs to continue to be billed for payments when you're no longer here.

Burial Requests

If you have a pre-planned funeral, you'll save a lot of family stress and probably some arguments by describing the type of funeral you'd like to have. The notebook provides a ceremony planner where you can choose whether to be cremated or have a traditional ceremony. You can also outline the location of your funeral, hymns, and scripture readings.

This section also contains an outline for your obituary, which would be much appreciated by the family member appointed to write a brief summary of your life and legacy.

List of Professionals

Usually, your children have no idea who your lawyer, banker, CPA/accountant, life insurance agent, stockbroker, or financial planner might be. You'll save them a lot of time and awkward phone calls by setting out that information in the notebook.

Asset/Liability Inventory

This is another area of our lives that we typically don't review with family, and every probate case requires a complete inventory of the property you or your Trust owns. Most people are surprised to find out how, or by whom, their property is legally owned and are pleased with the opportunity to change it now before it's too late.

If you don't have a notebook that contains this information, you're welcome to call our office and order one. If you already have one, fill it out or update it! Your family will appreciate this final gift at a time when they need it most.

The Mac and Cheese Legal Debacle

Can This Lawsuit Elbow Its Way to a Courtroom Win?

Here's a fun fact for you: In the fall of 2022, a woman in Florida sued food giant Kraft Heinz — all because it took her a few extra minutes to prepare her mac and cheese.

This may sound like a made-up plot straight out of "The Onion," but it's true! The woman's name is Amanda Ramirez, and according to National Public Radio, she's suing Kraft Heinz for $5 million over its "misleading advertising." What exactly misled her? Well, Kraft's cup of Velveeta Shells & Cheese claims it will be "ready in 3 1/2 minutes" — when in fact, that's just the microwave time.

Apparently, Ramirez felt betrayed when it took her slightly more than 3 1/2 minutes to peel the lid off the container and add water to the noodles. Her outrage only climbed as she waited for her pasta's cheese sauce to thicken after 3 1/2 minutes of staring at the microwave window. Before long, she was steaming over the notion that she'd been ripped off by a greedy manufacturer intent on selling false convenience.

NPR reports that Ramirez's lawsuit reaches beyond her kitchen and even beyond the state of Florida. It "looks to cover consumers in Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Utah, New Mexico, Alaska, Iowa, Tennessee, and Virginia who purchased the mac and cheese cups during the applicable statute of limitations period." Over 100 people fall into that category, maybe including you!

Does Ramirez stand a chance? It's hard to say. NPR reports that her legal team expects Kraft to try to get the case dismissed, but the U.S. does have a history of successful lawsuits against misleading advertising by food companies. According to NBC News, a class-action lawsuit filed over a non-GMO advertising campaign cost Chipotle $6.5 million in 2020. And just last spring, a Florida attorney went to bat against Burger King, claiming its Whoppers were smaller than advertised.

As we write this, the mac and cheese fiasco is still unresolved — but you can bet we'll be watching the news. We may even chow down on a bowl of Velveeta Shells while we do it!

What does parental alienation look like?

Imagine you're running five minutes late to pick up your child, and your ex tells them "Daddy/Mommy is late because they don't love you anymore" — a blatant lie. In this case, you would be the "target" parent and your ex would be the "alienating" parent manipulating your child.

One parent can also alienate the other by spoiling their child with gifts and travel opportunities while maliciously pointing out that the other parent can't or won't do the same. According to TMZ, Jolie has accused Pitt of child abuse and he now has "little to no relationship" with their six kids. If Pitt is not a child abuser — as a judge's award of 50/50 custody seems to indicate — this would be parental alienation. Alec Baldwin details his experience with what he calls parental alienation in his book, "A Promise to Ourselves: A Journey Through Fatherhood and Divorce."

What can you do about it?

The ABA reports that parental alienation has been recognized by lawyers, courts, and psychologists to varying degrees for at least 200 years. In many states, parental alienation is legally recognized, which means that proving it could impact your custody agreement. Other states don't take parental alienation as seriously, so we recommend asking your family law attorney about your specific state and situation.

In the meantime, family lawyer Patricia Fersch offers this advice in Forbes: "Document everything in a diary — missed visits, alienating behavior in the presence of the child. Be consistent with your child no matter how they respond to you. Don't abandon them."

VAN GOGH REINCARNATED?

One-Eared Rescue Dog Becomes Master Painter

When a one-eared shelter dog in Connecticut struggled to find a new family last year, one of his caretakers had a wild idea: Why not teach him to paint? With help from TikTok and peanut butter, the aptly named Van Gogh became a social media star.

"I'd seen TikTok videos of other dogs creating paintings, so why not Van Gogh?" Jaclyn Gartner, the founder of Happily Forever After Rescue, told The Washington Post. "He certainly had the name and the ear for it."

To leverage what she calls Van Gogh's "fast and creative tongue," Gartner covered small canvases in dollops of paint, wrapped them in plastic wrap, and slathered them in peanut butter. Then, she presented the treats to the boxer-pit bull mix. He quickly licked the canvases clean, creating his "art" along the way.

According to the Post, Van Gogh's first few paintings flopped — just like the work of the human artist Vincent Van Gogh, who didn't become famous until after he died in 1890. This star rose thanks to Jo Van Gogh, the wife of his brother Theo, who advocated for his work after both Theo and Vincent passed away.

You could say that Gartner was dog Van Gogh's Jo because, like the original painter's, the pup's art staged a comeback! After his first "art show" drew just two guests, Gartner started auctioning off his paintings online. His abstract work like "Peacock Swirl" and a rendition of human Van Gogh's "Starry Night" quickly raised more than $3,000 for Happily Forever After Rescue.

As his reputation soared on social media, Van Gogh also found his forever home with shelter volunteer Jessica Starowitz. He now spends his days painting and lounging on the couch. You can follow his exploits on Instagram under the handle @officialvgdog.
